

REPORT

THE PERSECUTION
OF EX-MUSLIM
CHRISTIANS
IN FRANCE & IN EUROPE

TESTIMONIES

CONTENTS

I. Methodology	page 1
II. Estimation of the number of converts from Islam to Christianity in France	page 2
III. Results of the survey on the persecution of converts	page 3
The sources of persecution	page 3
The reasons of persecution	page 4
Acts of persecution	page 5
Persecution is worse for young women	page 7
The particular problem of converted migrants	page 8
Attacks on Christian property: a corollary of this persecution	page 8
The reactions of converts	page 10
IV. What about elsewhere in Europe?	page 11
V. Responses to this persecution	page 16
The immediate management of crisis situations	page 17
Reception in Christian communities	page 18
The state response to the violation of their rights and security	page 19

ECLJ – European Centre for Law and Justice

© All Rights Reserved. July 2022

Contact : secretariat@eclj.org / + 33.3.88.24.94.40

www.eclj.org

Link to the video report (55' in French with English subtitles):
<https://youtu.be/IAOSp7YhNIU>

The European Centre for Law and Justice is an international, Non-Governmental Organization dedicated to the promotion and protection of human rights in Europe and worldwide. The ECLJ has held special Consultative Status before the United Nations/ECOSOC since 2007.

The ECLJ engages legal, legislative, and cultural issues by implementing an effective strategy of advocacy, education, and litigation. The ECLJ advocates in particular for the protection of religious freedoms and the dignity of the person with the European Court of Human Rights and other mechanisms afforded by the United Nations, the Council of Europe, the European Parliament, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), and others.

The ECLJ bases its action on "the spiritual and moral values which are the common heritage of European peoples and the true source of individual freedom, political liberty and the rule of law, principles which form the basis of all genuine democracy" (Preamble of the Statute of the Council of Europe).

I.

METHODOLOGY

The purpose of this survey is to determine whether people from Muslim backgrounds experience persecution for converting to Christianity in France and in Europe.

Persecution is defined by the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court as: “the intentional and severe deprivation of fundamental rights contrary to international law by reason of the identity of the group or collectivity.”[i]

The ECLJ investigated and met with leaders of the six main French associations, as well as one Belgian, two English and one Austrian association involved in evangelizing Muslims and supporting converts, and conducted more than twenty open interviews with converts, or ex-muslims.[ii]

Through these interviews and considering the decades of experience of some association leaders, which allow for the cross-referencing of hundreds of cases and individual experiences, the ECLJ has produced a video report as well as this report summarizing the personal experiences of persecution suffered today in France and in Europe by several thousand people born in the Muslim religion and later left, some of whom joined Christianity.

On the basis of these interviews, the ECLJ assessed the violations of fundamental rights suffered by these converts.

II.

ESTIMATION OF THE NUMBER OF CONVERTS FROM ISLAM TO CHRISTIANITY IN FRANCE

This situation would concern between 4,000 and 30,000 people in France. According to the official figures of the French Bishops' Conference[iii] about 300 people of Muslim origin receive the baptism in the Catholic Church every year. The figures for all the Protestant communities are not known,[iv] but considering the dynamism of the evangelical community, this number would be at least twice that of the Catholics.

According to a 2007 estimate, which seemed too high, 15,000 Muslims convert to Christianity in France every year: 10,000 to Catholicism and 5,000 to Protestantism[v].

Taking into account the fact that these conversions have been occurring at a slightly increasing rate for several decades, there would be at least 4,000 converts from Islam to Christianity in France.

Moreover, a report by the Montaigne Institute[vi] stated that 15% of people born to at least one Muslim parent consider themselves "non-Muslim." If we consider that there are 4,9 million Muslims in France according to a low estimate,[vii] 15% represent 735,000 people.

According to all our witnesses, "many" Christians of Islamic origin hide themselves, or remain "invisible." They are either absolutely discreet in their public religious practice, or they never become parishioners or members of a church.

Taking into account the dynamism of the host communities, and the fact that the majority of those who leave Islam turn to atheism or agnosticism, one can reasonably assume that 30,000 people converted to the Christian faith. It is not possible at this time to establish a more precise figure, neither for France nor for Europe. [viii]

III.

RESULTS OF THE SURVEY ON THE PERSECUTION OF CONVERTS

Today in France, it is at least difficult and more generally dangerous for a Muslim to leave his religion. The overwhelming majority of people who leave Islam to join Christianity experience family and communitarian persecution that varies greatly in intensity, from contempt to violence.

"It is not because we are in France that we are safe from persecution, be it physical, mental or psychological"

Saïd Oudjibou, Pastor and Founder of the Union of North African Christians of France.

THE SOURCES OF PERSECUTION

Persecution is firstly intra-family (parents, spouse, siblings, cousins, etc.); it is then communitarian. It takes place in real life but also on social networks where Islamists are very present and active. Finally, persecution can be anonymous and materialize at any time. Some Islamists carry out intimidation and intelligence campaigns to seek out and repress converts. It may therefore happen that a convert is discovered and threatened, assaulted, or even killed by an Islamist who they did not even know.

Persecution has no legal source in France because sharia law does not officially apply there. Despite this, certain provisions of sharia law can be applied in practice if a local Muslim community is sufficiently large and radicalized. Furthermore, if the convert's parents are nationals of a North African or Middle Eastern country where Sharia law applies, the convert may be deprived of their share of the inheritance. In Morocco, for example, when the succession opens, it is enough for a family member to denounce the heir son as no longer being Muslim for the latter to lose his share of the inheritance. Some of our witnesses have renounced their inheritance or doubt that they will receive it when the day comes. This is a loss of rights directly related to their conversion.

THE REASONS FOR PERSECUTION

Conversion, which implies apostasy (ridda), is condemned in the Koran, and violently condemned in the hadiths, which justifies for many Muslims a physical and moral persecution of converts. Within the Muslim community, there is a debate about the value of the hadiths and the interpretation of the Koran, but in fact, Muslims who violently persecute converts rely on these texts to legitimize their actions.[ix]

All witnesses agreed that the communitarian aspect of the Muslim religion is fundamental. The communitarian perception of Islam, of the "Ummah" implies that any departure, any conversion to another religion is necessarily a defection, a betrayal. It is inconceivable for most Muslims that a person of North African origin, be not a Muslim. Many Muslims on the road to conversion believe, for a time, that they are the only ones in the Muslim community who are considering conversion and wonder whether it is even possible to convert. There is an identification between "Arab culture" and "Islam".

Some Muslims consider that conversion is a provocation because it is not really necessary according to them. Several parents advised their converted sons or daughters to remain officially Muslim and to believe in Christianity secretly. Thus, while the child can change their internal beliefs to accord with non-muslim convictions, the parents desire that they externally keep up muslim appearances for the sake of their safety.

The witnesses explain this by the fact that the strong communitarianism is counterbalanced by a weak private respect for the precepts of the Islamic religion. Within the Muslim community, there seem to be basically only two imperatives that are essential to this communitarian membership, namely, not eating pork and observing Ramadan.

The other precepts, which are important and sometimes in principle obligatory, are subject to a wider tolerance in their application. The convert would therefore be a provocateur, since he could easily have another religious belief while pretending to be a Muslim and respecting at least the two imperatives. As such, the convert's parents may also be persecuted if they tolerate their children's conversions, since as educators they are deemed responsible for their "betrayal."

ACTS OF PERSECUTION

Persecution can take the following forms, in order of severity and frequency. They may or may not be successive, but almost all converts suffer at least the first two:

- Contempt and verbal aggression towards the convert when announcing the conversion
- Threats, acts of intimidation or harassment, in order to persuade the convert to return to Islam, occurring within the family, community, or on social networks
- Rejection of the convert by his family
- Expulsion or flight from the family home
- Threats to the convert's physical integrity
- Destruction of the convert's property, the ransacking of their place of living, efforts to have them lose their jobs
- For girls: sequestration until they return to Islam
- Physical violence towards the convert, from spitting to beating, to lynching in public, with or without a knife...
- For girls: forced marriage, return to the family's country of origin, rape
- Murder and assassination

There is a gradation in the reaction. The majority of Muslims generally react with a sanction of "social death" by applying the first three acts of persecution. More rarely, Islamists such as the Salafists or the Muslim Brotherhood will seek to "wash away" the scandal caused by the convert and will apply more radical persecution.

All of our witnesses have endured the first three forms of persecution. Those who do not suffer the following persecutions are generally those who organized themselves better to avoid any risk.

For example, one father told us that "everything is fine now". In reality, he had moved far away from his hometown, had cut off all contact with his family for several years and never spoke to his neighbours. In fact, he found himself in a more liveable situation, but at the cost of many sacrifices for his social life while still living in a certain fear: he only agreed to testify on the condition that his voice be modified. Another convert in the Paris region, living in isolation, even told us: "I am lucky to be on my own."

"28 years later, I still have no contact with my family. Even if there has been a lot of water under the bridge... among Muslims, one does not leave the circle."

Amaria, convert.

It is necessary to insist on this point: apart from the association leaders, no witness wished to appear with their face and their real name in our report. We almost systematically changed the voice and removed references to the French cities where the events took place. There is a palpable fear when talking to converts from Islam: they all fear a violent reaction from their family or community.

This fear is accentuated by social networks. During the interviews, we were able to collect reliable information that some radical Muslims put a price on the contact information of converts. This kind of call for denunciation keeps converts heavily afraid. Not only does it mean that they must keep a low profile, even if they are already living away from their families because anyone could spot them and report them, but they must distance themselves from social networks, or at least be very careful. Several witnesses have given up having an account on social networks and others refrain from sharing any word or image that promotes Christianity. There is genuine self-censorship.

According to many of the witnesses and association leaders interviewed, a significant proportion of converts are subjected to acts of violence by their brothers or cousins.

We have several direct testimonies of beatings and injuries and attempted break-ins if the convert retreats to their room or apartment.

Generally, these acts of violence cause the convert to leave their place of residence. Whether they flee after the first blow or leave the house after their brother has ransacked their room, witnesses say that this escape avoids more serious violence.

In fact, some were even lynched in the street. A former Salafist Muslim who converted to Christianity confirmed the existence of actual ambushes. Several Muslims from the local community, with or without family members, wait for the convert in the street and beat them, sometimes to death, usually with their fists, iron bars or knives.

Finally, Saïd Oudjibou (UNACF) and Father Paul-Élie Cheknoun (ACIMM) were able to confirm that converts have been subjected to this type of lynching, with rape if it was a girl, resulting in their death. These cases are rare, but the possibility of their occurrence leads to the fear of the converts who say to themselves: "If someone close to me starts to be violent, God knows where it will stop. I have to leave." Several young converted women told us that they were convinced that there would be a violent physical reaction from someone close to them if their conversion became known, and that they would not take the risk of knowing if that person would go as far as to kill them.

"He went as far as to chase her down to stab her."

A young girl about a converted friend being chased by a family member armed with a knife.

PERSECUTION IS WORSE FOR YOUNG WOMEN

Persecution is more severe for women, who are exposed to acts of persecution at a consistently higher degree than men. This additional violence against women is justified by the "dishonour" they would bring to the family by denying the faith of their parents. According to Saïd Oujibou (UNACF), 70% of converts are women. Him and other witnesses said that the situation of women in Islam is inferior to that of men, which gives them more reasons to want to leave Islam.

Some girls who reveal their conversion to their parents may be threatened by them with forced marriage to a "devout Muslim"; confined as long as they do not return to Islam; or sent back to their country of origin if they are from North Africa; all with the same goal: that they return to the Muslim religion of their parents. Men who convert do not face these specific threats.

"There is an insult among Muslims: I would have preferred you to be a prostitute rather than a Christian."

Amaria, convert.

THE PARTICULAR PROBLEM OF CONVERTED MIGRANTS

In the context of non-European immigration, some migrants are converts who fled their Muslim countries because of persecution. They face a double problem.

On the one hand, they emigrate from Muslim countries with other people who are predominantly Muslims. This poses additional difficulties in "migrant camps" where overcrowding, waiting and lack of resources are already sufficient factors to cause unrest.[x] On the other hand, two association leaders pointed out to us that, when immigrants arrive in France, they speak French very poorly and need Arab translators. However, Arab translators are very often Muslims and it is therefore possible for them to hinder the presentation of a converted migrant's file. It is impossible to estimate the number of cases, but it is a real concern for migrant converts and those who work to welcome them.

One example illustrating such tensions, published in the French Newspaper Le Monde: "Christian migrants allegedly thrown into the sea by Muslims off the coast of Italy - An investigation into this unprecedented tragedy was opened by the public prosecutor's office in Palermo."

ATTACKS ON CHRISTIAN PROPERTY: A COROLLARY OF THIS PERSECUTION

Damage to Christian sites has been occurring for many years in Europe, and the pace is accelerating. According to the OSCE, in 2019 there were more than 500 legally recorded attacks on Christian sites: Crucifixes, churches, host thefts, etc. France is the most affected country (MARES 2020). While the motive for the attack on Christian symbols is not always established with certainty, cases of damage motivated by Islamism and hatred and rejection of Christianity are becoming significant. According to Csaba Szabó: "It is an increasingly common public security challenge in Europe that Muslim immigrants loot/damage Christian churches in the name of Islam".[xi] Securing religious sites is an essential corollary to the exercise of religious freedom. If the buildings are regularly attacked, this is likely to intimidate the faithful, who would not be safe in places of worship.

The Observatory on Intolerance and Discrimination against Christians in Europe regularly publishes reports on this subject. The 2019 report showed the numerous attacks on Christian sites and people, often by Muslim radicals, which have taken place not only in France but also in other countries in Europe.[xii]

These regular attacks and degradations contribute to the climate of anxiety that affects converts and show that if some only attack objects, others are ready to go further.

TV Report on an attack on worshippers during a short procession in Nanterre (near Paris, France) on 8 December 2021 (CNews screen capture).

"Catholics increasingly threatened"

After a hundred meters, for our first stop, we started to be insulted by passers-by: "this is not a cathedral... you are kuffars, miscreants... get out, you don't belong here." The tension rose and the group that was surrounding us came into contact: "Wallah on the Koran, I'll cut your throat."

THE REACTION OF CONVERTS

Whether the convert be male or female, the infringement of religious freedom is evident in all cases: they are prevented from freely practicing their faith.

All our witnesses were in the same initial situation: living with extreme discretion and in fear of being discovered during their spiritual journey towards Christianity. They are obliged, out of fear, to hide their faith and reveal their conversion to their loved ones only after careful consideration.

For example, they cannot talk about their new religious convictions in the family; they generally do not keep any Christian possessions in their parents' house; and as long as they are not independent, they are prevented from going to church if they are likely to be seen by someone they know.

This obligation, for all converts, to exercise great caution and social discretion about their conversion, leads them to live a double life: pretending to be Muslims with the community, and living their Christian faith the rest of the time when possible. Depending on the personal situation, this double life is more or less difficult and burdensome; so much so that some converts are monitored by psychologists. A young convert under 18 years of age was trembling when she told us on the phone about her situation, was on the lookout for the slightest noise that might indicate that someone was listening to her and said that she was currently seeing a psychologist because of the anguish generated by her double life.

Converts also suffer from 'ethnic bias'. This apriori assumption is widespread among people of immigrant origin as well as people of long-standing European origin: an Arab person would necessarily be a Muslim. Thus, Arab-type converts are presumed to be Muslims. Therefore, Muslims, assuming that an Arab-looking person is a Muslim, will approach them with an Islamic greeting, speak Arabic to them, or assume that they are on Ramadan. This is very problematic because it actually forces the convert to reveal themselves or lie.

This has particularly hit Cheick Mkaitir, a Mauritanian refugee who arrived in France in 2019. He was sentenced to death in his country for apostasy in 2014, following an article he published in 2013 against Sharia law. Now living in a large French city, he noted the strong presence of the Muslim Brotherhood, who create an actual parallel society. He personally suffers from this cultural and ethnic bias. He has been insulted many times when Muslims approaching him realised that he was not a Muslim himself. He is now very cautious and isolates himself because he has also noticed that there is tattling among Muslims when one of them knows that a person is not a Muslim.

It becomes awkward, at work or at school for many converts because of the presence of other Muslims from whom they try to hide their conversion.

Ramadan time, drinks with colleagues, as well as work or school relationships and interactions between men and women are all moments when the converts may be caught not following the precepts of Islam and then suffer at least contempt from other Muslims and sometimes more severe retaliation (harassment at work or wrongful termination if the employer is Muslim).

Religious practice and the process of officially joining a church is severely complicated for many converts. For example, some must travel dozens or even hundreds of miles to be prepared for baptism.

Moving is often necessary for men and almost always necessary for women, especially if their Christian faith is discovered in the parental home. According to the young women we spoke with and to the paths that the association leaders described to us, they cannot announce their conversion to their parents if they still live at home. Some of them manage to find a job or training far from their parents, allowing them to be freer, but it is not possible for all of them.

All the converted young women told us that they feared being or had been beaten by at least one of their brothers, or by a member of their family or community. Faced with this violence, running away is the only solution, but a dramatic one, since these girls find themselves alone, without money, without work, without housing and without family. It is very difficult to estimate the number of girls in this situation, but considering the number of calls for help that the associations receive every year, it concerns at least several dozen girls. A number to which must be added those who manage to execute their runaway correctly.

IV.

WHAT ABOUT ELSEWHERE IN EUROPE?

Elsewhere in Europe, there are at least ten "ex-Muslim" associations and other more or less confidential groups for ex-Muslims. Most of these associations or groups support people who leave Islam to become, for the most part, atheists, agnostics or indifferent and, more rarely, Christians.

The information we have been able to collect in several European countries remains patchy at this stage. However, all the testimonies received from other European countries are consistent with what we have seen, heard and observed in France. Here are some of the testimonies and information we were able to collect to date, from which we have subtracted much of what we have already explained and detailed above.

A word about Germany to begin with. Several witnesses or association leaders assured us that Germany was certainly one of the most difficult countries for converts and that we would have no trouble finding testimonies. In the end, we were able to obtain very little information about Germany. There are associations for ex-Muslims (inter alia, Zentralrat der Ex-Muslime, Zde) and elements of our initial report for France were corroborated by German residents.

However, for all European countries, and particularly Germany, we found that almost all the associations that deal with persecuted Christians on other continents are little or not at all concerned with persecuted Christians in Europe. It is certain that the situation for an ex-Muslim who becomes a Christian is much more difficult in Pakistan or Nigeria. Yet, the situation is becoming really worrying in Europe and awareness has to be raised in the world of associations for the defense of newly-converted Christians.

BELGIUM: MEETING WITH THE PRESIDENT OF THE "EX-MUSLIM" ASSOCIATION

The Belgian president of the "Ex-Muslim" association was not originally a Muslim but converted to Islam in order to marry a Sudanese woman. After several years of moderate practice of Islam, geopolitical events made him question Islam. It was the biographies of the Prophet Muhammad and the historical books on the original development of Islam that convinced him to leave Islam. As a result, he founded this association to support other people who, like him, leave Islam.

All the members of the association are anonymous 'to avoid trouble' and most do not tell their relatives that they have left Islam. The support meetings he organises are very important so that ex-Muslims can 'vent', support each other and avoid feeling isolated. The stories he has heard over the years from these people describe a reality essentially identical to that in France: parents threatening their own apostate children with death; young 'apostates' being pushed out of their families, even by 'moderate Muslims'; the imperative to do Ramadan so as not to be noticed; and finally, despite efforts, having to leave to escape the pressure or threats. He told us of several examples of people being fired for criticising Islam in the workplace in Belgium, either because the employer was himself a Muslim, or because an employee's comments had upset Muslim colleagues and the employer wanted to preserve social peace in the company.

The President of this association was struck by the lack of reaction of the Belgian authorities to the persecution of ex-Muslims. Having obtained an appointment with a representative of the Ministry of the Interior a few years ago, he was able to present a set of testimonies of the threats and reprisals suffered by dozens of people over several years. The representative of the Belgian Ministry of the Interior acknowledged the existence of a problem, but showed no willingness to act in response. Finally, the President of the association was very concerned that Belgian social services employ many Muslims and that this is a real issue for the reception of "apostates" from Islam who, for example, have to flee their homes and may face real discrimination.

ENGLAND: HATUN TASH & NISSAR HUSSAIN

Hatun Tash and Nissar Hussain are two converts, both strongly engaged for the rights of converts in England. They can legitimately confirm that the situation there is very similar to France in all respects, especially in London, where the Muslim community is very large, as both have been violently attacked in public.

According to Hatun Tash, many converts find it difficult to deal with the social pressure exerted on them by the Muslim community. She explained that more than 60% of converts return to Islam within five years of their conversion, especially during the major holidays of Christmas and Easter, when the feeling of loneliness is very strong, or during Ramadan, when islamic social pressure is at its peak.

She also raised the fact that if a convert turns to the police, this normally triggers an investigation and ultimately more risks for the convert who often find themselves in a situation where it is their word against that of their persecutors. According to her, normal recourse is not necessarily the best solution, or in any case, it cannot be the only solution to help converts.

Hatun Tash is extremely committed to evangelism, and, with DCCI, her organisation, she visits London's famous Hyde Park's Speaker Corner every week, where she engages with people, trying to convince them of the merits of Christianity. On 25 July 2021, she was violently stabbed by a man in response to her criticism of Islam (see photo below). She survived her injuries and continues her evangelistic work with determination despite the continuing threats.

Nissar Hussain is a British-born Pakistani man who converted to Christianity and also paid a high price for it. On his way home one evening in November 2015, he was violently attacked by two men waiting in a car with baseball bats. He suffered multiple fractures and still suffers from post-traumatic stress disorders today. This was a culmination of persecutions that have been going on for years with rejection, insults, spitting, etc.

According to him, this threat of death to anyone who wants to leave Islam amounts to genocide. Where sharia law is applied, it is not possible for a person to leave Islam and pursue a normal life. Thus, throughout history, thousands of people have wished to leave Islam without being able to do so, as the threat fell on those who dared to defy the ban. There is an intrinsic oppression in Islam that has historically always sought to physically eliminate anyone who leaves Islam.

AUSTRIA: THE EXAMPLE OF SABATINA JAMES

This woman of Pakistani origin, whose parents moved to Austria, converted to Christianity in her teens. She was threatened with forced marriage and had to flee her parents' home after revealing her conversion. She is now under police protection and has written a biography from which the following information is taken.[xiii] The value of her claims is particularly strong because following the publication of her book, Sabatina James' parents sued her for defamation. However, in January 2005, an Austrian court ruled against the parents and declared the facts in the book to be accurate.

"My head was clearly telling me, 'Sabatina, your parents are already angry that you don't want to marry Salman. How will they react if you renounce Islam? How will you live without your family? I shuddered at the thought of losing them, and I knew that if I turned to Jesus, all ties to my family would be cut.'" (p.179)

Her story shows that Sabatina James sought and succeeded in integrating the Austrian society, while her parents continued to "live the Pakistani way" and planned to have their daughter marry a Pakistani cousin. The girl was beaten by her mother when she discovered her diary showing that she was dating an Austrian boy.

The importance of the role of shelter homes was also noted. Ms. James expressed great relief that there was a place to go to if things went wrong. In fact, she took refuge there after being beaten again and threatened with forced marriage. She said she met a Turkish woman in the same situation at the shelter. The social services initially correctly assessed the risk for Ms. James and agreed to keep her. However, when her parents offered to take Sabatina James back to Pakistan, and social services encouraged her to accept the proposal. She fell into a real trap and was enrolled in a Pakistani Koranic school to accept her forced marriage to her cousin.

After agreeing to be engaged to her cousin, she was able to return to Austria. She converted by reading a Bible given to her by a former classmate. She then refused to marry her cousin and was expelled from her home by her mother.

She was again taken into emergency accommodation and testified that the revelation of her conversion to Christianity made her father "blind with rage". This was the beginning of constant persecution: harassment by telephone, at home, at work (she lost her job because of incidents caused by her father), threats, repeated insults, death threats if she did not renounce her Christian faith. "The honour of the family is more important than my life or yours," her father told her.

Sabatina James filed a complaint with the police, but the parents denied it, so no action was possible since it was her word against theirs. Her Christian friend who had given her the Bible walked away from her to avoid taking any risks. Sabatina James then left the town where she lived for another one, before even leaving the country for Germany, for a place where... she knows no one.

She has since set up an association to help young girls who have been forced into marriage or abused by their families and to prevent them from becoming victims of honour crimes in Europe.[xiv]

"She went into my room, violently opened the wardrobe door and took everything out. Then she came back, opened the front door, and threw everything out into the hallway. In the end, she took an empty plastic bag and threw it into the hallway too. "Go to hell. You are not our daughter anymore. I don't want to see you anymore." With that, she pushed me into the hallway and slammed the door in my face." (p.189)

THE NETHERLANDS

According to an association in the Netherlands to whom we presented our report concerning France, the situation in the Netherlands is quite similar except that the concentration of Muslim communities in certain neighbourhoods or cities is less than in France. Social pressure against converts is therefore generally lower than in France. Verbal threats are also common, and 'honour killings' occur very occasionally, although they are not systematically linked to a conversion or to an intimate relationship between a Muslim girl and a Christian.

According to the association, there is also a kind of separation according to the national origin of the Muslim community in the Netherlands. For example, Muslims of Pakistani origin may repress a convert of Pakistani origin, but will be more indifferent to the conversion of a Muslim of Moroccan origin. The nationality of origin is thus a factor that can decrease or increase the risk of persecution.

In this country, we can also cite a person who testifies publicly to this fact. Faraidoun Fouad found the courage to speak publicly about his conversion from Islam to Christianity. This street preacher does not escape the rule of reprisals. He is regularly threatened, insulted and his property attacked (for example, the windows of his car have been broken on many occasions).

V.

RESPONSES TO THIS PERSECUTION

The reception of these converts to support them psychologically and materially is deficient and does not help them assert their rights. Only a few associations are committed to showing such support and face limited means and effectiveness.

According to converts and association leaders, to effectively support ex-Muslims, three main responses must be provided:

1. Immediate crisis management
2. Welcoming them into the Christian community
3. The State response to the violation of their rights and security

1. THE IMMEDIATE MANAGEMENT OF CRISIS SITUATIONS

If a converted person or a person in the process of conversion is discovered or finds themselves in a distressing situation, two necessary responses must be reinforced:

- establishment of a dedicated hotline;
- emergency relocation.

First, counselling assistance needs to be provided to Muslims who are thinking about changing their religion or who would like to do so. According to several officials, converts must be warned and taught how to avoid unnecessary risks associated with the practice of their faith around the Muslim community. For example, primarily by not revealing their conversion too early and anticipating negative reactions. There is also a certain amount of advice to be given to guide and protect a muslim person in religious questioning.

Initiatives in this sense are developing and could be supported by local churches.

Emergency rehousing is a serious problem faced by association leaders: following the announcement or discovery of conversion, the convert is either literally chased out of their home or pushed to flee by violence or the threat of violence.

However, these associations have limited resources, and help could be provided both by the State and by the churches. Let us remember that, according to the apostolic texts, the Church is the family of converts and therefore its duty is to welcome and support converts in need.

Raising the awareness of public assistance, departmental councils and victim support associations about the particular situation of converts should enable them to be properly taken care of, such as not placing them in temporary living situations with Muslims.

2. RECEPTION IN CHRISTIAN COMMUNITIES

There is a great sadness and incomprehension among converts that they are not better welcomed by the religious communities they join. Whether among Catholics or Protestants, the quality of the reception of a convert from Islam varies according to whether the pastor or priest is informed and sensitive to the situation of converts from Muslim backgrounds.

We were told of priests who reproached the convert with leaving Islam, of priests who refused to catechize Muslims who requested it, and of pastors who asked someone outside their church to take care for a convert in distress. One person testified to have written to the bishopric of Paris about their desire to enter the church but never received a reply. More generally, converts claim to find an unwelcoming community of Christian faithful. Two examples were given several times: converts are almost never invited to share a meal for a feast, and they are more seen as "former Muslims" than as full Christians.

There is also a noticeable tension when a convert from Islam expresses a critical discourse towards the Muslim religion.

The convert is often accused of caricaturing or making a generalization out of their story, and sometimes even of lying and not "really" knowing Islam. According to several leaders, this tension is rooted in a conception of interreligious dialogue that refuses to hear any criticism of Islam. An ex-Muslim Christian is sometimes seen as a "problem."

These comments, attitudes and reactions towards converts cause great suffering. Many converts have lost almost everything by choosing Christianity: their family, their city, sometimes their job or their university studies. When they enter the Church, they hope to find a new family and for many of them, it is a cold shower. Some are welcomed and find a real family, but many others are not welcomed.

Consequently, after several months or years, loneliness and material difficulties helping, a significant part of converts to Christianity from Islam give up. According to association leaders, between 10% and 50% of converts abandon the Christian religion after several years of practice. Whether they abandon all religious practice or officially return to Islam, the lack of appropriate reception by Christian communities plays a major role in these departures.

According to all the members of associative support teams for converts, most evangelical and Catholic authorities have difficulty understanding and taking responsibility for the spiritual, relational and material welcome of converts. It is therefore necessary that an awareness be raised.

3. THE STATE RESPONSE TO THE VIOLATION OF THEIR RIGHTS AND SECURITY

At present, France and other European countries do not adequately guarantee the rights and freedoms of those who wish to leave the Muslim religion, including the right to change their religion. For the ECLJ, the appropriate response to these testimonies must be firm and lawful: these rights and freedoms must be effectively guaranteed and protected. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights,[xv] the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,[xvi] the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union,[xvii] and the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[xviii] are clear sources of international law guaranteeing this right, and France has committed itself by ratifying them.

The French Law to strengthen respect for the principles of the Republic, adopted on August 24, 2021 reinforced the proper application of Article 31 of the 1905 law:

Punishable by one year's imprisonment and a fine of 15,000 euros are those who, either by threats against an individual, or by making him fear losing his job or exposing his person, his family or his fortune to harm, have acted with the purpose of making him exercise or refrain from exercising religious practice, to be part of or cease to be part of a religious association, to contribute or refrain from contributing to the expenses of a religious community.

The penalties are increased to three years' imprisonment and a fine of 45,000 euros when the perpetrator acts by assault or violence.

As these persecutions of converts from Islam are mainly situated in the family context, it is delicate for the converts to lodge a complaint since this would imply most of the time denouncing their father, brother or cousin before the courts. The penal response cannot therefore be the only one to fight against this phenomenon of obstruction to conversion.

Another suitable solution to allow people from a Muslim background to effectively choose the religion of their choice would be to give more strength and visibility to "the Charter of Principles for Islam in France."

Article 3 of the Charter, which dealt with freedom, stated that:

Freedom is guaranteed by the principle of secularism which allows each citizen to believe or not to believe, to practice the religion of his choice and to change religion.

Thus the signatories undertake not to criminalize a renunciation of Islam, nor to qualify it as "apostasy" (ridda), still less to stigmatize, or to call for, in a direct or indirect way, the attack of the physical or moral integrity of those who renounce a religion.

The signatories thus commit themselves to respect Article 9 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights. This article enshrines the freedom of thought, conscience and religion.

This article is important because it recognized and aimed to prevent the persecution suffered by converts from Islam in France. This second paragraph summarized what witnesses and association leaders have told us. This article 3 of the Charter is necessary and is not respected by a part of the Muslim community in France.

Faced with the refusal of several Muslim associations to sign this charter, the Ministry of the Interior should verify the reasons that push them not to sign it. It is not acceptable that Muslims in France and elsewhere in Europe refuse to tolerate those who leave Islam.

The fight against the disclosure of personal data, or "doxing", must be intensified. Doxing is the practice of searching for and disclosing information about an individual's identity and private life on the Internet or to people who request it, with the aim of harming them. The information revealed can be identity, address, social security number, bank account number, etc. We have seen that such practices exist on social networks against converts. In France, these acts are now punishable by three years of imprisonment and a fine of €45,000 under Article 223-1-1 of the Criminal Code.

"It would be wishful thinking to ask Muslims in France to accept and welcome people who choose to leave Islam"

Mehdi D., Founding member of "Mission Ismérie"

Finally, public inquiries by the Ministries of the Interior are needed to shed light on these converts and to obtain more accurate statistics in order to better understand this phenomenon in France and in Europe.

If the States do not establish and acknowledge the reality of the problem, most public actors will continue to deny any persecution of those who leave Islam and will prevent thousands of people from living in peace and exercising their religious freedom.

The ECLJ particularly thanks all the witnesses as well as the following associations: ACIMM (Association des Chrétiens Issus de Milieux Musulmans), DCCI Ministeries (Defend Christ, Critique Islam), Islam et Vérité, Jésus le Messie, Legalise Apostasy, Mission Ismérie, Notre Dame de Kabylie, UNACF (Union des Nord-Africains Chrétiens de France) as well as other associations that wished to remain anonymous for security reasons.

Notes

[i] United Nations, Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, A/CONF.183/9, 17 July 1998, Art. 7, § 2, g.

[ii] ACIMM (Association des Chrétiens Issus de Milieux Musulmans), Islam et Vérité, Jésus le Messie, Mission Ismérie, Notre Dame de Kabylie, UNACF (Union des Nord-Africains Chrétiens de France), and another who wished to remain anonymous for security reasons.

[iii] Conférence des évêques de France, "Baptisés de Pâques 2018 - Dossier presse," 298 baptized from Islam for the year 2018.

[iv] The Fédération protestante de France (FPF) and the Conseil National des Évangéliques de France (CNEF) do not keep individual records on the number of converts and their origin.

[v] Daniel Pipes, « When Muslims Leave the Faith », Wall Street Journal, 6 août 2020, accessible sur son blog : <https://www.danielpipes.org/19668/when-muslims-leave-the-faith>

[vi] Institut Montaigne, Un islam de France est possible, September 2016.

[vii] Rémi Banet, Benoît Fauchet, « 20 millions de musulmans en France ? Ils sont environ 4 fois moins, selon les estimations les plus sérieuses », AFP, May 17, 2018.

[viii] According to Roberto Simona, who presented a thesis in 2019 in Switzerland, there would be several hundred converts to Christianity from a Muslim background in Switzerland. Considering that Switzerland is 8 times less populated than France and has a smaller Muslim community, this corroborates our estimate. "When Muslims become Christians and Christians become Muslims" Catholic Media Center, February 5, 2019.

[ix] This is reflected in the law of several Islamic countries. In 2020 apostasy was punishable by death in the following 10 countries: Afghanistan, Brunei, Iran, Maldives, Mauritania, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Somalia (implicitly), United Arab Emirates and Yemen.

[x] France Info, « Calais : ce que l'on sait des affrontements entre migrants qui ont fait quatre blessés graves », 2 février 2018, https://www.francetvinfo.fr/monde/europe/migrants/calais-ce-que-l-on-sait-des-rixes-entre-migrants-qui-ont-fait-quatre-blesses-grave_2590480.html

[xi] Csaba Szabó, "Growing tendency in attacks targeting Christian holy places in Europe," in Budapest Report on Christian Persecution 2021, Mondat, 2021, p. 118.

[xii] The Observatory on Intolerance and Discrimination against Christians, Report 2019, https://www.intoleranceagainstchristians.eu/fileadmin/user_upload/publications/files/Report2019_final.pdf

[xiii] S. James, "Mourir pour vivre à nouveau" (original title: Sterben sollst du für dein Glück), Le cherche midi, 2010.

[xiv] <https://www.sabatinajames.com/our-work/>

[xv] Article 18: "Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance."

[xvi] Article 18: "1. Everyone shall have the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. This right shall include freedom to have or to adopt a religion or belief of his choice, and freedom, either individually or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in worship, observance, practice and teaching.

2. No one shall be subject to coercion which would impair his freedom to have or to adopt a religion or belief of his choice.

3. Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs may be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others.

4. The States Parties to the present Covenant undertake to have respect for the liberty of parents and, when applicable, legal guardians to ensure the religious and moral education of their children in conformity with their own convictions."

[xvii] Article 10 - "Freedom of thought, conscience and religion

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. This right includes freedom to change religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or in private, to manifest religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance.

2. The right to conscientious objection is recognised, in accordance with the national laws governing the exercise of this right."

[xviii] Article 9: "Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance."